Academia often too quickly dismiss research ideas as “too applied,” “already been done” or “too simple” to be relevant to our discipline. In this seminar, Shawn Conley will address these misconceptions through real world examples from his research program and how those “simple” experiments tend to provide the greatest impact to both his research and extension program.